As in most of the local cemeteries, some of the flags for veterans are obviously misplaced. Some of this happened in the 1960s and 70s when war protestors and pot-smoking hippies pulled up these markers, especially the bronze ones and melted them down to make pot pipes. When (or if) they were replaced, sometimes with plastic, the deserving graves had been forgotten.

The last name “Persons” and “Parsons” seems to be interchangeable; some members of the family spelt it one way, others another. This is also true for another family represented in this graveyard, and that is “Simons” or “Simonds” I know for a fact that this is the case both in Colebrook and in Sandisfield. Ed Simonds gave me a book entitled “The World As It Is”, written in 1842, and his father’s name was written on the inside front cover very clearly “Simons”. During the summer of 2010, an official of the state government visited the Colebrook Historical Society on business and was quite interested in the material we had on the Simonds family, and cast light on the reason for the two spellings. She is a direct descendent of this branch of the family, and gave us this account: Ed’s father (Ed was born in 1864), while on a trip to New York, became aware that there were Jewish immigrants who spelled their name “Simon, or Simons”, and as he didn’t want anyone to mistake his ancestry with those who had recently arrived on these shores, changed the spelling, (or at least began inserting a “d” to dispel any confusion.) The family settled in this neighborhood prior to the Revolutionary War, when the road past the cemetery was called “Hardscrabble Road”. Ed’s ancestors built overlooking the pond, hence the name “Simons Pond” until 1904, when the McClaves, as new owners of all the land surrounding that body of water renamed it “Lake Marguerite” after their eldest daughter.

The condition of some of these headstones is getting worse by the year, especially the limestone ones. This is mainly due to acid rain. The headstones that are best preserved are not stone, but zinc. This one has a bullet hole in it from some idiot who didn’t know how to use a rifle. There are quite a few of these zinc headstones in the area probably due to the fact that Solomon Sackett, who lived in all of these contiguous towns at one time or another, had the franchise from the manufacturer, located in Bridgeport, Conn. As a consequence, Colebrook, Sandisfield, Winchester and Norfolk, plus more that I don’t know about, have many examples in their cemeteries.
